A hypothetical trade has many initially inherent limitations, some of which are listed below. One of the differences between the hypothetical trades is that its results are a consequence of the analysis of past events. It is worth adding that hypothetical trade does not implicate financial risks, and not even one hypothetical trade can take into account the effect of financial risks, that pertain to real trade. For example, the ability to bear losses and keep to a specific trading program, despite the fact that losses in trade are material losses that could disadvantageously affect the results of trading. There are many other factors related to markets in general, or how a specific trading program is implemented, which cannot be fully taken into account when calculating the results of hypothetical trade, but which can disadvantageously affect the results of real trading.
